How do you...

Persuade a government to ban tobacco advertising?

Campaign against dumping of toxic waste?

Energise the fight against AIDS?

In The Fight for Public Health, Simon Chapman and Deborah Lupton show how lobbying through media advocacy can be a powerful tool in mobilising public support and getting public health legislation passed. Illustrated with photographs and crammed with compelling examples from around the world, this lively and entertaining guide:

- Describes what advocacy is
- Shows how public opinion has influenced public health policy in the past
- Includes an A-Z of strategies for gaining media attention.

"This splendid book moves the art of media advocacy a giant step forward. Chapman and Lupton's counsel leapfrogs continents; it will be as welcome and applicable in London and Washington as in Sydney."

Michael Pertschuk, Director, The Advocacy Institute, Washington, DC

It is generally recognised that stress is a major factor in working days lost and other costs to industry, while results from the 1990 Labour Force Survey suggest that stress caused by work is the second largest major cause of occupational ill-health.

RESEARCH INTO THE SCALE AND COSTS OF OCCUPATIONAL STRESS

The Health and Safety Executive wishes to sponsor research to determine more clearly the scale of stress caused or made worse by work, the actual ill-health effects and the real cost to industry, both nationally and in relation to different sectors and occupations.

Applications are sought from research workers in Universities or equivalent organisations for research projects lasting up to 3 years. The proposers, who must demonstrate previous successful research performance, should have access to multi-disciplinary expertise in the fields of occupational medicine (in particular occupational stress), epidemiology, statistics and economics.

Further details and application forms are available from: Mrs C Fisher, Room 112, Research Strategy Unit, Health & Safety Executive, Broad Lane, Sheffield S3 7HQ. Telephone: 0114 2892424 Fax: 0114 2892400.

Potential contractors are invited to register an interest by 7 April 1995. The closing date for receipt of proposals is noon 24 April 1995.

A VITAL ISSUE FOR ALL ANAESTHETISTS

At last here is a practical book that relates the process of quality assurance to the drive to improve the quality of anaesthetic practice.

Edited by Jonathan Secker Walker, with contributions from leading figures in anaesthetic audit, Quality and Safety in Anaesthesia describes the important work already done and addresses aspects such as:

- Risk management ● Resource management
- Standards and postgraduate training ● Critical incidents and human error
- Use of computers ● Design of equipment for safety
- Managing a department for anaesthesia

A must for all those working or thinking about working in anaesthesia departments!
